

has also received an airing. Apparently, it is now revealed, Simon Cole tried to persuade Cheryl to save the twins to avoid the embarrassment of having to do it himself. Clearly she ignored his pleas and gave her decision based on who she thought was better... Lucie Jones (above).

The furious grandmother of Lucie Jones yesterday insisted Simon Cowell was desperate to get her off The X Factor because he feared she would beat his own acts: "I think Simon Cowell chickened out. I said all along if it came down to Lucie and anyone else he would get rid of her because he is afraid of her. He is afraid of her voice. He said all along he wanted a male singer to win this year. He is protecting his own acts."

According to the Telegraph, Jedward's mentor Louis Walsh, has admitted he doesn't believe they will be crowned winners. Broadcaster ITV was flooded with an astonishing 3000 complaints after the show but Ofcom has announced they will be not be investigating the situation since there was no breach of the broadcasting code.

Another voting fiasco has also hit the headlines recently after the new series of Strictly Come Dancing has grabbed the nations attention.

Ofcom were involved with last years show after three couples had to be allowed in the final after voting 'irregularities'. The BBC escaped censure then, after offering to refund the cost of telephone calls. This years Week 7 event resulted in an obviously good dancer loosing out to a possibly more popular celebrity. Since then, one of those already booted off, Joe Calzaghe, whose dancing style was judged by Craig Revel Horwood as 'Rigor Mortis', has complained that the show is 'fixed'. Mr Calzaghe declined to say what it was that he had actually said about one of the judges, commenting only that it was worse than a swear word!

Who will win in 2010, well it's still too early to say. My money would be on Ricky Whittle but star of The Bill, Ali Bastion (below) is definitely better looking.

Staying with 'good looking' for a moment you may have missed the OK magazine award for most Eligible Man earlier in the year. Robert Pattison pictured below is described as Hollywoods current hearthrob. After topping the Most Eligible Men's chart Rob will now find no difficulty in finding a girl of his choice. Rob has also been quoted by the publication as saying, "Last year all I was trying to do was get a girlfriend". Poor Rob! Last year he was desperate to find a girl and now he actually has to run away from them.

Pattison is apparently in the running to play the part of Prince Harry in a film known as 'The Spare' following the highs and lows of Prince William's life including his time serving in Afghanistan. casting is expected to begin early in 2010.
